“ I knew Freeman decades ago. He definitely had a wry sense of humor and was quick to see the many ironies and inconsistencies of life. He liked good comedy such as SCTV. He would have loved Jiminy Glick's latest interview of Bill Maher. While rather quiet, he was a great observer of people as well the conversations they would have. Nothing got past him. As a Southerner, he was proud of Carter and Clinton. Freeman also was quite aware of his own self-doubts and worked courageously to improve himself in life. Though I never really thought of it, the women he knew in his younger days agreed that Freeman was tall, dark, and handsome. Now he peacefully rests.
