Tammie was never shy about speaking her mind

Cindy and Tony Mashburn - November 22, 2018 at 09:32 AM

“ I never got to meet Tammie but followed her battle by speaking to her and Steve on face book. I know the love they shared was so special. What a blessing they had to share such a special love for one another. Tammie was such an inspiration to me and to everyone who knew her. She fought so hard and with such faith. She loved God and she is with him now and there will be no more pain for her. God bless you Steve for being there for her and taking such good care of her. You are special too. RIP Tammie. So many people loved you and will miss you.

“ A life between 2 sisters is a bond held together with love, shared secrets, childhood and adult memories. Born a year apart Tammie became my sister and best friend. We've shared our squabbled over the years and never remained angry with the other for more than a few minutes/hours. I held her hand the moment she came into this world and held her hand when she departed this world. And Tammie reunited with her son Jimmy. Can almost imagine the smile on Jimmy's face when his momma walked toward the Heavenly gates. Inside the Burden basket I had made for Tammie, I stuck my hand in the covered basket and rifled through the folded notes and pulled out a folded paper to find that Tammie had written a letter addressed to me to read after her death. Unable to read beyond the first sentence I gently folded the paper and placed inside the basket.

“ Tammie used to send me pics of her when she was depressed because she knew that I would call her to cheer her up and it worked everytime she said I was way better than her depression pills but I cost more. We hated being apart even for a short time

“ I have known Tammie almost my whole life. She has always been good to me. Tammie was always full of joy and laughing about something. One of the things that sticks in my mind is when Danny Joe was a baby and I spoiled him to being walked all the time. We lived across the street from her and she would come over and get me up at night and she'd tell me you spoiled him now you walk him. I'd just laugh at her and get up and walk the baby. Lol 🤪 I love Tammie very much and will miss her always.
